WATER DRINKING IN HOT WEATHER .-Hall's Journal of Health, high authority, has the following: A subscriber who has injured himself by drinking too much water on a hot day, while engaged in the harvest-field, asks us if it would not be better to use some other drink, as tea or coffee. We think that there are more persons injured by dring artificial drinks in the hayfield than by drinking water. It is true that drinking large quantities of cold water, when one is heated and thirsty, is injurious, and should not be allowed. But if people would use a little sense and less salt, butter, meat, ash-cake, and greasy food, they would not suffer so much with thirst, and there would be little occasion to complain of the water producing injury. Fruit, and the fresh un-fermented juices of fruits, too if more treely used in hot weather, would release the system from the need of so much water, and promote health. We speak from knowledge on this subject, having observed the experiments with all sorts of drinks. Coffee is a favorite drink in the hay-field for many, but it destroys the appetite and corrupts the blood in the end producing fever and weakness, and should not be
